

FLASHLIGHT VERSUS WOLF SCARS

THE FINAL WORD ON WHAT GETS THE LADIES

BY THOM

The debate regarding which adornments attract the opposite sex has flared up again, and the newest entrants are a Copper flashlight versus the wolf bite.

We all know what wolves are; feral dogs that run in gangs and eat our cats. But fewer people know that with this full size, super-efficient bright and shiny copper illuminating tool that it is harder than a wolf's fang. With a push of its dual-output switch it produces a dazzling 50 lumens of wolf-blinding light or 6 lumens of trail-walking light, with 10 hours of total runtime.

What's sexier? A copper flashlight that can temporarily blind an attacker (such as a wolf) and make you look and feel cool too? And it can get you off a mountain to tell the tale of the wolf attack you just thwarted! Of course, a wolf bite will leave a wicked scar—assuming you avoid the digestive process—but unlike a wolf bite, you can use this flashlight to see — as you fashion a tourniquet out of your intestines, sew up your flapping skin, and crawl back to Doolittle Park and tell everyone.

For all these reason I believe this handy, dandy little copper gem to be even more seductive than lupine scarification. So, if you want to bag a supermodel in Index, or if you have enough wolf scars already, get your hands on this flashlight today. For Sale now!
